Animal Science: Isotopes and Nuclear Techniques by John E. Vercoe In many regions of the world, animal production is limited by poor growth, reproductive performance and milk output of livestock, thus limiting the availability of animal products such as meat, milk, leather, etc., for use by man. Reduced animal production results from

To study these, isotope techniques are available. When a small amount of a substrate labeled with a radioactive, e.g.  $^{14}\text{C}$ , or a stable, non-radioactive, e.g.  $^{13}\text{C}$ , isotope is infused into the circulation, the disappearance of the isotope can subsequently be analyzed from serial blood samples and the rate of substrate utilization can be calculated.
